Why does Trump want Greenland and what do its people think?

US President Donald Trump has repeated his intention to take over Greenland, the Arctic territory controlled by Denmark. He told Congress that Greenland was bound to become a US territory, and that his administration was working hard to "get it - one way or another".

Greenland, the world's largest island, is located in the Arctic. An autonomous - or self-governing - territory of Denmark, it is also home to Danish and US military bases.

In recent years, there has been increased interest in Greenland's natural resources, including mining for rare earth minerals, uranium and iron. These may become more accessible as global warming leads to some of the ice covering Greenland to melt.

Why does Greenland matter to the US? "If Russia were to send missiles towards the US, the shortest route for nuclear weapons would be via the North Pole and Greenland," said Marc Jacobsen, an associate professor at the Royal Danish Defence College. "That's why the military base is immensely important in defending the US." But Trump is also likely interested in the mining potential across Greenland's vast landmass, Mr Jacobsen added, especially the rare earth minerals in the south.

Kuno Fencker, a member of the Inatsisartut, the Greenlandic parliament, said that he didn't see Trump's comments as a threat.

But when BBC correspondent Fergal Keane visited the island in January, he said he heard one phrase again and again: "Greenland belongs to Greenlanders. So, Trump can visit but that's it."

When the president first raised the idea of buying Greenland in 2019, many locals told the BBC they were opposed to the proposal.

"He's treating us like a good he can purchase," said Aleqa Hammond, Greenland's first female prime minister. "He's not even talking to Greenland - he's talking to Denmark about buying Greenland."
